If an image editing company had a golden product that the public loved, they could sell it to a myriad of customers, count on its long-term success, and leave. But that's not the reality of the brand Adobe, and currently, their flagship software is not as solid as its stable predecessors. I am expecting the new Photoshop from a company that seems to be fast out of the gate with new releases, and I am concerned about its long-term support - particularly Adobe Creative Cloud. So, there you have it. Admittedly, not all of Photoshop's powerful new features were addressed, but I think the time has come for Adobe to get back to the basics and ensure that Photoshop remains the ultimate image editor in the market, while its competitors try to catch up in an attempt to retain their customer base. Lightroom 6 certainly made it harder for customers to switch. With a wide-range of unique features, brand new tools such as Adobe Camera Raw, and a solid CPU-optimized interface, it's not easy to leave Lightroom behind, is it? Do you agree with my review of Adobe Photoshop? Weigh in below. Don't miss our top-rated, free photo editing software. Learn more. The free version of this poses a problem because of the "intellectual property" that it refers to, which I could not be bothered to look up. Like, the entire Photoshop library? Even allowing parts of the programs, just to mean - everything is available to the free version? Or, just referring to Adobe's own design, user interface or "Elements™", or something else like that? Or, all of it. It's bizarre that Adobe thinks that content which was released under the GPL (or other variations, like CC licences) should be released under the same licence as to which all the software was legally sold. We know what the original version of Photoshop was, and we know that it was released to the public under the GPL. Having the full source code available means all ideas, designs and other features, which now belong to the public, are also.

If you bought it legally, then you can have a complete copy of it. If you bought a copy that was just a demo, then you own a restricted version. Why not set things straight, and allow others to trade between the versions, or at least make them proprietary, so you couldn't trade out? Adobe give the equivalent of throwing away your software, because they like their products, but don't want to give it back to you because they can't. Is this a good deal?
