When I open a new document in CS6, the first thing I look at is the Filters & Layers panel. Many of these filters are new, such as the Ultra-Saturated Colors and Ultra-Vivid Color, which add a blue-orange tint to images. If I hone in on an area of the image, I can see the colors it should end up with on the edges gradually change. Photoshop CS6 will be the first CS version without an integrated scanner. For that reason, the Raw Converter is gone, too (a bummer, of course. We hope it comes back eventually!). You can also open photos directly in the Raw Converter from the left-hand side of the window. Another new tool is the Content-Aware Move tool. It isolates and “pulls” an object or place in one area of the image and moves it to another location. This new tool is really capable and if you just want to pull something out of the image, it's great. I do a lot of scrap booking, so I've used it a lot with pictures from our house. Color management using Input, Output, and Black Wedges is now done via a ColorChecker Passport that you can download from the web app. It also lets you manually utilize the new Output Gamma slider control. The new Content-Aware Fill tool is no longer limited to only filling the initial blacked out area. Now, more and more, I have been using this technique. Photo editors in general are more and more popular these days. I believe it is because image editing software is so easy to learn and a lot of it is free. Photoshop, apart from being the most famous of the bunch, also has the most powerful tools.
